If He Sought Election, He'd . . .

To The Dallas News:

If I were running for public office and wanted to make sure of winning, I would take a strong stand against busing, using all the emotion I could. I would faithfully support all of Nixon's appointments to the Supreme Court, Justice Department, etc.

I would overemphasize law and order. I would support the tightest laws governing morals, such as in censorship and homosexuality. I would never waver on my stand against marijuana. I would never consent to amnesty to those who chose to leave the country, or to political prisoners.

I would support the strictest discipline in schools, including spanking. I would support granting of large federal loans to large military-industrial projects, then cry for local control and free enterprise and support of "the little man." I would argue very strongly for capital punishment. I would urge the dissolution of the U.N. I would support all the CIA efforts citizens know nothing about, such as propping up dictatorships and carrying out wars.

I would support every bill that increases defense spending and decreases aid to "unfriendly" nations. I would urge giving big business as much time as they wanted to institute pollution control. I would never encourage academic freedom or dissent or controversial professors. I'd allow the "shoot-to-kill" method to restore "order." I would encourage the complete bombing of North Vietnam (and Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, etc.), while stressing that we're pulling out troops—but let nothing stand in the way of victory.

I am not running for office, though, and I will do what I can to work for the defeat of all those who run on a platform containing the planks listed above, which exploit the lowest of human emotions, misunderstandings, fears, prejudices and interests.
